In May, billionaire Microsoft founder Bill Gates published an article advocating for a simplified process of the Free Application for Federal Student Aid, or FAFSA. Gates said the application has 108 questions — three times the length of a standard federal income tax form.

Charlie Javice, a 26-year-old University of Pennsylvania grad, recognized the same problem as Gates. In late 2016 and early 2017, Javice sat with close to 1,000 students in the South Bronx helping them fill out financial aid request forms.

"Just by sitting and counseling all of these students — every story is unique but every problem is kind of a pattern that emerges, and it's how you can fix a piece of technology and application process that dates back to the 50s," Javice told Business Insider.
